The Spring Framework features its own model-view-controller (MVC) web application framework, which wasn't originally planned. The Spring developers decided to write their own Web framework as a reaction to what they perceived as the poor design of the (then) popular Jakarta Struts Web framework, as well as deficiencies in other available frameworks.

Spring Framework (Spring) is a powerful, lightweight, and easy-to-use framework for building Java applications. It provides a comprehensive set of tools and libraries that simplify the development of web applications, microservices, and other types of software. Spring is built on top of the Java Platform, Standard Edition (JSE) and the Java Platform, Micro Edition (JME). It is designed to be easy to learn and use, and it provides a high level of abstraction that allows developers to focus on the business logic of their applications rather than the underlying infrastructure. Spring is also highly extensible, allowing developers to customize it to meet their specific needs. Spring is a popular choice for developers because of its flexibility, scalability, and ease of use. It is a key component of the Java ecosystem and is used by millions of developers around the world. Spring is a must-have for any Java developer who wants to build modern, scalable applications.
